Have you been so confused with when to use "assure," "ensure," and "insure" that you actually go back and rewrite your sentence to avoid using that word? I confess, I do that often. "Ensure" and "insure" and "security." These three verbs - assure, ensure, insure - all have the same general meaning: "to make sure." The devil is in the details and context is key to determining when to use each of these words. The simplest way I've found to keep these three words straight is as follows: ASSURE: Something you do to a person, a group of people, or an animal to remove doubt or anxiety. Example: I assured my team that I would bring my world-famous tiramisu to our next team meeting. In order for that to happen, I need to eradicate about a thousand Canadian thistles from my backyard, otherwise, someone is sure to step on one of those spiky little buggers and not have fun at my party. How to remember this: If I'm trying to ensure something, I'm trying to ensure something, I'm trying to ensure something, I'm trying to ensure something you can do to limit financial liability. Example: It's a good thing I called State Farm to insure my new flute because I accidentally dropped it and backed over it with the car and she forgot about it. She started to back down her driveway. The flute case slid off the top of the car and she ran over it. She had insurance coverage on her flute, which limited her financial liability, and she got her flute repaired and a new flute case and was only out about a hundred bucks. How to remember this: If you don't insure your car and end up in a fender bender with a Rolls-Royce, your income will be impacted. Insure and income both begin with "in." You can also remember it this way: Have a grammatical question you'd like me to explore? Drop me a line at catherine Spicer (prnewswire.com. A version of this post originally appeared on PR Newswire.
